JULIA MARIA JAYAN

The natural environment provides resources significant to achieve dignified lives and well-beings. Climate change is a phenomenon that affects social, economic and political concerns all over the globe. The supreme fundamental right of a person is the right to life but it is the primary subject that is curtailed by climate change. Anthropogenic climate change is one of the most enormous threats to the natural environment and human societies the world has ever experienced. This is not merely an abstract- future possibility, it is to be noted that about 80% of the Global population is at risk of crop failures and starvation due to the same. It has been a severe problem for a long time, but now it is in high time to raise the concern due to the worst stage. United Nations agencies and national Governments have explicitly acknowledged climate change and are working together to get things to normal. This article focuses on how climate change affects individual rights and summarizes the obligations of government and individuals towards it. Then examines implementations of these obligations and provides recommendations on how conferences of the parties, national governments, and other factors can integrate Human rights into their adaptation activities.
